

Ruth Warren

Ruth Warren began her career teaching mathematics at John Adams High School after graduating with a B.A. in Mathematics from Indiana University Bloomington. During that time, Warren attained an M.S. in Secondary Education, also from IUB.

As Director of Title I, she led successful school improvement efforts at several elementary schools, focusing primarily on literacy and shared governance.

After earning her Ed.D in Educational Leadership at Indiana University Bloomington, she was appointed principal at Eggleston Elementary. There, she continued to lead school wide reform efforts. In 2002, Warren became principal of Clay High School, and retired from that position in 2010. While at Clay, her accomplishments were initiating Freshman Academy, Smaller Learning Communities, Peer Mentors and READ 180. Clay High School was the first school to partner with Robinson Learning Center in implementing Restorative Justice. She also led groups of students on educational tours to China.

Upon her retirement, Warren spent two years teaching English in Hangzhou, China. Interested in other cultures and languages, she has a beginning level proficiency in German and Chinese. Other retirement activities have been volunteering at Indiana Legal Services, John Adams High School, and the St. Joseph County Public Library.

Daughters Emily, Naomi and Esther attended Perley, Jefferson, and Edison, graduating from John Adams High School. Warren and her husband, Jesse travel extensively and spend time with their six grandchildren.
